Anyone who has seen the Holman Island Inuit printmakers' work, on calendars, in museums, or in galleries, will recognize the unique style of Kalvak. She did not begin drawing until she was in her late fifties or early sixties, and it is fortunate for her admirers that Father Henry Tardy had the foresight to save many of Kalvak's early drawings.

I met Kalvak in October 1966, and for the next 17 years I visited her once or twice a year. My major concern was to supply her with good paper and other materials so she could develop her innate artistic ability. Thanks to Father Tardy and Kalvak's daughter, I was able to communicate with her for all those years without knowing her language, or she mine. We did a lot of drawing together, smiling at our attempts to draw each other.

Kalvak's drawings from the early 1960s resemble patterns drawn by seamstresses; they are not unlike Steinberg drawings. In my opinion, these early pieces far surpass the limestone cuts made of her drawings by the cutters of Holman Island. I counted over 900 pencil and marking-pen drawings by Kalvak in the early 1970s, many of which were later translated into prints.

Kalvak's subjects were a mixture of her physical environment, animals, and shamanism; her vision captured the true nature of the far north. That vision will live on to enrich our enjoyment and understanding.

Kalvak was awarded the Order of Canada in 1979. A film released in 1970 by the University of Calgary Communications Department shows many of her drawings as well as Kalvak herself in her prime.

Leo Bushman